次の英文を読み、空所（ 1 ）と（ 2 ）に入る最も適切な単語を文中から選び、解答欄に書きなさい。カッコに入る単語は1語とは限りません。

Food waste is a serious issue in many schools today. According to the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA), schools not only need to reduce and recycle waste, but they also have a key role in educating students about food conservation. Teaching students why food should not be wasted can help them value what they eat and use resources more carefully.

Research shows that nearly 30 percent of food served in school lunches is thrown away. This is a concern because wasted food means wasted money, lost nutrition, and more environmental damage. Reducing food waste in schools can help improve student health and save public funds.

Programs that let students serve themselves, like “share tables” where uneaten items are returned for others to take, can help reduce waste. When schools offer these strategies, students can take only what they want, and the rest can be used by others. Such changes help students think about food as a resource, not just something to consume.

Dr. Mia Johnson, a nutrition educator, said: “School programs that teach about wasted food give students practical skills. Students learn the importance of planning meals and using leftovers, and they also develop a sense of responsibility to save resources.”

Question:

According to the nutrition educator, school programs teaching about food waste help students understand the (1) of wasted food, and develop a (2) in protecting resources.

It was a beautiful afternoon. The sky was blue, the sun yellow, birds sang, and to cut a long story short, all Nature smiled. But Lord Emsworth's younger son Freddie Threepwood, as he sat in his car at the front door of Blandings Castle, with a fine big dog at his side, did not even notice these excellent weather conditions. He was thinking of dog biscuits.

Freddie was (1)only an occasional visitor at the castle these days. Some years before, he had married the lovely daughter of Mr Donaldson of Donaldson's Dog-Delight, whose aim was to keep the American dog in top condition by providing it with health-giving biscuits. Freddie had gone to New York, to work for the company. He was in England now because Mr Donaldson had sent him to do what he could to encourage sales (2)there. Aggie, his wife, had come with him, but after a week or so had found life at Blandings too quiet for her, and had left for the South of France. As soon as Freddie had finished his work in England, he planned to join her there.

Just then, a small, well-dressed gentleman of about sixty came down the front steps. This was Freddie's Uncle Galahad, a well-known figure at London theatres, restaurants, and music-halls, and at horse races all over the country. Freddie greeted him warmly. He knew that his (3) Constance considered that *Gally gave the family a bad name, but Freddie admired him as a man of endless resource and intelligence.

'Well, young Freddie,' said Gally. 'Where are you going with that dog?'

'I'm taking him to the Fanshawes, at Marling Hall.'

'That's where that pretty girl lives, isn't it? The one I met you with the other day?'

'That's right. Valerie Fanshawe. You see, her father keeps lots of dogs. And each one needs his daily biscuit. And (4)what could be better for them than Donaldson's Dog-Delight?

'You're going to sell him dog biscuits?'

'It'll be simple. He'll do anything for Valerie. She wants this dog and says that if I give it to her, she'll persuade the old man to send in a large order. I'm just going to deliver it.'

'But, my good Freddie, that is Aggie's dog. She'll be terribly angry if you give it away.'

'Don't worry, I've thought of that. I'll tell her it died, and I'll get her (5) just as good. That'll keep Aggie quiet. But I must get on with things. See you later,' said Freddie, and disappeared in a cloud of smoke.

Gally shook his head. A lifetime of dancing, drinking and betting had made him the least narrow-minded of men, but he could not admire his nephew's way of doing business. Going back into the house, he met Beach, the *butler. Beach was a little breathless, because he had been hurrying. Over the last few years he had become considerably heavier and slower; he was no longer the healthy young butler he had been when he first started work at the castle.

‘This telegram has come for Mr Frederick, sir. I thought it might be important.’

‘(6)Most unlikely. Probably someone sending him the result of the four o’clock race somewhere. You’ve just missed him, anyway. Give it to me. I’ll give it to him when he returns.’

Gally continued into the house, wondering how to pass the afternoon. He decided to go and talk to his brother *Clarence, and found that gentle and dreamy lord in the smoking-room, staring fixedly at nothing.

‘Ah, there you are, Clarence,’ he said, and Lord Emsworth sat up with a jump, his whole body trembling.

‘Oh, it’s you, Galahad.’

‘That’s right. What’s the matter, Clarence? A man whose soul is at rest does not jump out of his skin like that when somebody appears. Tell me all.’

A sympathetic listener was exactly what Lord Emsworth wanted. ‘It’s*Connie,’ he said unhappily. ‘Did you hear what she was saying at breakfast?’

‘I didn’t come down to breakfast. I prefer to sleep late.’

‘Ah, well, (7)you missed it, then. Right in the middle of the meal—I was eating a fried egg at the time—she told me she was going to get rid of Beach.’

‘What! Get rid of Beach!’

“‘He is so slow,” she said. “He gets breathless. We ought to have a younger, smarter butler.” I was shocked. I nearly swallowed my fried egg whole.’

‘I don’t blame you. (8)Blandings without Beach is unthinkable. So is Blandings with what she calls a younger, smarter butler. By Jove! I can imagine the sort of fellow she wants—some bright young man who will be running here, there and everywhere, and making us all feel old. You must show her who’s boss, Clarence, and be firm.’

‘Who, me?’ said Lord Emsworth. What an idea! In name, of course, he was lord of Blandings, but in practice Connie’s word was law. Look at the way she always made him wear a top hat at the Blandings Castle Open Day. Last time a child had even thrown a cake at it. But Connie always insisted.

‘I can’t be firm with Connie.’

‘Well, I can, and I’m going to. Sack Beach, indeed! After eighteen years of service. It’s a terrible idea. She must not be allowed to do this awful thing.’

At that moment, footsteps were heard in the hall and on the stairs. Lord Emsworth recognized them and looked even more unhappy. ‘It’s Frederick,’ he said. He still felt that (9), the better.

‘I’ve got a telegram for him,’ said Gally, remembering. ‘I’d better take it up to him.’

‘Do,’ said Lord Emsworth. ‘And I think I’ll go and have a look at my flowers.’ But today, even his beautiful roses failed to cheer him up. The thought of Blandings without Beach simply ruined his ability to concentrate.

He was staring miserably at a flower-bed when Beach himself appeared. 'Excuse me, my lord. Mr Galahad asks if you would step inside to the smoking-room to speak to him.'

'Why can't he come out here?'

'He has hurt his ankle, my lord. He and Mr Frederick fell downstairs.'

'Oh?' Lord Emsworth was not particularly interested. Freddie was always doing strange things. So was Galahad. 'How did that happen?'

'It appears that (10).'

When Lord Emsworth reached the smoking-room, he found Gally lying on a sofa, looking not greatly disturbed by his accident. He was smoking a cigar.

'Beach tells me you had a fall,' said Lord Emsworth. 'He seems to think it was (11)something to do with Freddie's telegram.'

'That's right. It was from his wife.'

'Ah. Frances.'

'No, her name's Aggie. And you see, in it she says she will be arriving here the day after tomorrow.'

'I see no problem there.'

'Freddie does, and I'll tell you why. He's just given her dog to Valerie Fanshawe.'

'Who's Valerie Fanshawe?'

'You know, the daughter of Captain Fanshawe of Marling Hall. One of your neighbours. Haven't you met him?'

'No,' said Lord Emsworth, who never met anyone if he could help it. 'But why should Frances worry about Freddie giving this young woman a dog?'

'Aggie. And I didn't say a dog, I said her dog, whom she loves madly. It wouldn't matter so much if Valerie Fanshawe were fat, ugly and wore glasses, but unfortunately, she is a real beauty, with golden hair, blue eyes and a wonderful figure. As soon as Aggie sees Valerie Fanshawe and finds out that Freddie has given this lovely girl her favourite dog as a present, she'll probably divorce him. Wives often do that in America. And then her father will (12)sack him, and he'll have to come back home.'

'What, to the castle?' cried Lord Emsworth, deeply shocked. 'My God!'

'So you see how serious the situation is. However, I've been giving it some deep thought, and I'm glad to say I've solved (13)the problem. We must get that dog back before Aggie arrives here.'

'You will ask Rosalie Fanshawe to return it?'

'Valerie. No, she would refuse. Someone will have to steal it, and this is where you come in.'

'I?'

'Who else is there? Freddie and I are both lying on our beds of pain, unable to move, and I don't think we can ask Connie. Your quick intelligence has probably already told you what you have to do. Just walk around to the Fanshawes', say around ten o'clock tonight, and hide somewhere near the back door. Their butler is sure to let the dog out for its last visit to the bushes—everyone does that and it's always at the back door. And that's when you get hold of it and bring it back here.'

Lord Emsworth stared in horror. 'But, Galahad!'

'It's no good saying "But, Galahad!" It's got to be done. You don't want (14)Freddie's whole future ruined, do you? Or to have him at the castle for the rest of his life? Ah, I see you tremble. And dash it, it's not much I'm asking of you. Just pick up a dog and bring it back. A child could do it.'

'But what if the dog refuses to come with me? After all, we haven't been introduced.'

'I've thought of that. You must put *aniseed on your trouser legs. Dogs follow aniseed to the ends of the earth.'

'But I have no aniseed.'

'Beach will be able to find some. And Beach never asks questions. Unlike Connie's young, smart butler, who would probably be full of them.'

As Gally had said, Beach neither showed surprise at the request nor asked questions. He brought the aniseed, and at the appointed hour Lord Emsworth left for (15), smelling strongly. Gally lit another cigar, and started doing The Times crossword puzzle.
